Considering the comprehension of wholeness as essential for nursing practice, intensive therapy nurses must address spiritual issues. The main objective of this study was to investigate the care provided by nurses in intensive care units regarding the spiritual dimension. Metodology include qualitative study with 15 nurses who work at intensive care units at public and private hospitals in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. 10 focal groups were conducted to produce the data, which was analyzed according with Bardin's content analysis method. Results showed three categories: "the ICU caring space", "the meaning of being a nurse in ICUs" and "the caring dimension in ICUs". A second level of analysis took place, guided by Jean Watson Clinical Caritas Process. It was concluded that nurses who work at ICUs are immersed in a heavily technological environment and the main focus is on the body dimension. Nevertheless, when they perceive the patients' spiritual needs, they can foster hope and faith so as to relieve the suffering caused by the disease and intensive care hospitalization processes. The study revealed that they are capable of integrating the human experience as they care for their patients.
